CULTURE

The Most Anticipated Art Shows and Exhibitions of 2024

By Maxine Wally, Andrew Wilkins and Claire Valentine
Published: June 4, 2012
Originally Published: Jan. 16, 2024

Courtesy of the artist(s).

The arts calendar for 2024 is positively stacked. There's "The Harlem Renaissance and Transatlantic Modernism" at The Metropolitan Museum of Art, an exhibition showcasing paintings, sculptures, and photographs to chronicle the famous artistic and social movement; the Ai Weiwei show with Taiwanese-American artist Lee Mingwei, who is known for his installations that call for audience participation; and "Picasso's War" at the Museum of Modern Art, examining the work of the world-famous artist at the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts. And that's just in Q1. It's a lot to keep track of, but fear not: we've put together a list of the highlights of this year in New York City, Los Angeles, and beyond. Consider this your grab-bag guide to the arts and extra exhibitions of the season, and check back often—we'll be updating this list as more events roll in throughout the year.

Lauren Halsey at the Parrish Art Museum

Lauren Halsey, photo-sculpture (detail), 2023.
Courtesy Halsey Studio and Hauser & Wirth and Sprüth Magers

If you're visiting the Hamptons this summer, consider making a stop just a half-hour away to Water Mill—it only to see the artist Lauren Halsey's work on display at the Parrish Art Museum. In collaboration with The Flag Art Foundation, Parrish is hosting the first-ever East Coast presentation of Halsey's work, which will feature both new and established artists on display. On June 8, the artist kicks off with Halsey's pride n progress thang, which will be mounted in the Long Island space's Creative Lounge. The artist, a Los Angeles native who still lives and works in her hometown of South Central, is known for her large-scale, layered, mixed-media works. Halsey's Parrish exhibition, "Everything Is Connected," will feature sculptural works consisting of "Egyptic-modernist hieroglyphs that monumentalized the Black experience of LA's Crenshaw District"; Pride n progress thang carries on that credo in spectacular fashion, with neon hues, palm trees, and billboards that evoke a Southern California spirit. The piece will be on view through August 25, whereupon Water Mill and Flag Art Foundation will rotate in a new artist.

Don't Touch My Hair at Hannah Traore Gallery

J.J. Adan Jimenez, Dish Dapat (I Abide), 9.25.
Courtesy of Hannah Traore Gallery

In New York City's Lower East Side, gallerist Hannah Traore is putting on a group exhibition that's particularly personal to her. Don't Touch My Hair, opening June 8th at Hannah Traore Gallery on Orchard Street, is all about—you guessed it—hair. In the exhibition, which features artists from all over the African diaspora, Traore's individual who wears it every day. (That hair bit is especially important to Traore, who curated the show after losing her own hair due to hypothyroidism.) Through the eyes of 18 artists including Camila Falquez, Ransom Shaw, and the Nigerian photographer J.D. Okhai Ojeikere, both hair, hair styles, objects made with hair, and hair's relationship to identity will be explored. Expect a wide range of media—primary mediums, and representations of hair are rendered in paintings, photographs, and installations. Don't Touch My Hair—a nod to Solange's 2016 song of the same name—runs through July 27th.

Ebecho Muslimova: Rumors at Mendes Wood and Whispers at Bernheim

Ebecho Muslimova, Whispers, 2023.
Courtesy of the artist and Bernheim

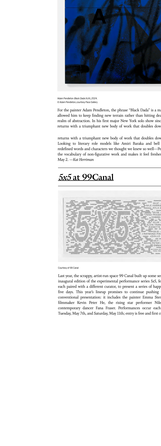
The visual artist Ebecho Muslimova will debut at her eponym ous exhibition at Bernheim, a new gallery in Zurich, Switzerland, that's opening in June. Natural Fairbe, the character is "a surrogate self, or a self-device," as Muslimova, who was born in Russia and now lives between New York and Mexico City, described in a recent interview. The allows me to flatten out certain emotional or mental states," she explained. "I can project them onto her, and then I can observe her translating these feelings into a dual show being held on two different continents. First, there's "Rumors" at Mendes Wood in São Paulo, which debuted on May 25th; then, there's "Whispers" at Bernheim, opening on June 8th. Both will run for a few months and will have a corresponding "mirror painting in the other city, like a game of telephone, or a long-distance romance," a press release from Muslimova reads. Fairbe is up to her old hijinks again in the new exhibition: paintings depict the character nude, flashing her crotch beneath a tent, or using a pair of binoculars to peer into the distance. Fairbe's gaze is fixed on the sky, and her power is transcribed the metaphorical. "Rumors" will show at Mendes Wood through October 8; "Whispers" runs until July 20, at Bernheim.

Alicja Kwade and Agnes Martin: Space Between the Lines at Pace Los Angeles

Alicja Kwade and Agnes Martin: Space Between the Lines 2023 (both) Installation view, Los Angeles, 2023 © 2023 Alicja Kwade / Artists Rights Society (ARS), New York Photography by Rob Harris and Kevin Parry Courtesy Pace

For her first major exhibition since joining Pace's roster, the artist Alicja Kwade presents nine new sculptures in conversation with works by Agnes Martin at the gallery's Los Angeles space. Though the two artists come from different generations and backgrounds—Martin was born in Canada and died in 2004; Kwade was born in Poland and has been involved in the possibilities of the time- both living a meditative sensibility, and both are interested in questions of time," says Pace founder Arne Glimcher in a statement. "Martin's grids and Kwade's spheres and circles lend themselves nicely, with time. I have always felt Agnes's work is closer to music than it is to traditional painting, and with Alicja, there is a parallel sense of adjacency with other modes of perception." The resulting exhibition, on view through June 29, offers a quiet opportunity for reflection and retreat.

Paul McCartney: Photographs 1963–64: Eyes of the Storm at Brooklyn Museum



Artists Rights Society (ARS), New York
Brooke Shaeffer

The Beatles's whirlwind rise to global fame has been covered ad nauseum, but never before has the public gotten an intimate glimpse at what it was like on the inside of the band's bubble. That's the promise of "Paul McCartney: Photographs," featuring more than 200 of Paul McCartney's previously unpublished personal photos. Paired with video clips and archival footage, the photographs, taken at the height of Beatlemania on McCartney's Ferrari during the band's first U.S. tour, capture the intense wave of energy the Fab Four were riding as they performed all over the country, starting in New York City. The exhibit is on view May 3–August 18.

Ettore Sottsass: Shapes, Colors, and Symbols at Sotheby's

Bertrand Huber

Italian architect Ettore Sottsass is best known for bold, bright furniture that brought a spirit of optimism to a shell-shocked, postwar world hungry for color and inspiration. A new survey of his work at Paramet celebrates this legacy, in addition to showcasing Sottsass's lesser-known work. The show, which is co-curated by the exhibition, opens May 8.Jesse M. Ivanov "It pieces spanning five decades, and includes ceramics, furniture, and rare glass works inspired by Native Hopi kiviya dolls, made just before Sottsass's death in 2007. Each piece illustrates Sottsass's unique ability to elevate everyday objects into something otherworldly—like the Memphis-esque ceramic sculpture pictured above, which looks like a cross between a Hooshagoda mixture Rare beast helped spark the Sottsass revival on Instagram, as seen in influencer Sottsasses everywhere. The exhibit shows that design should be, as Sottsass once said, like "an aspirin for a headache"—solving problems and soothing the nerves at the same time.

Reynalda Rivera: Fistful Of Love/También La Bellcza at MoMA PS1

Reynalda Rivera, Friend Bracelet and Ring Necklace (July 4 Fist Fan), 2020.
Courtesy the artist and Hauser & Wirth and Sprüth Magers

The photographer Reynalda Rivera is a fixture of Los Angeles. A weekender and resident keeper of the highest order, he knows all the history, even the parts they don't put in the guidebooks. Now, Rivera is the subject of a show at MoMA PS1 that looks his first institutional show on the East Coast (but spring at MoMA PS1. The title, "Fistful Of Love/También La Bellcza," is a lyric from a love song but also a nod to Rivera's Mexican heritage, and the exhibition will feature a mix of photographs, love and violence. Freed from the rise of its origins, or now of them, the work gets a chance to resonate in new ways, revealing Rivera as not just a documentarian but an auto-literature, writing romances with a camera as he lived them. Opens May 16. — Kat Herriman

Adam Pendleton: An Abstraction at Pace New York

Artist Pendleton (Born Detroit, 8/21, 1979)
© Adam Pendleton/Courtesy Pace Gallery

For the painter Adam Pendleton, the phrase "Black Dada" is a mantra, one that has allowed him to keep finding new terain rather than hitting dead ends within the confines of abstraction. Now, at Pace New York, Pendleton's "An Abstraction" returns with a triumphant new body of work that doubles down on the concept. Looking to literary rule models like Amiri Baraka and Sarl Sanbo—who have both written about how Black people are struggle we have as well—Pendleton plans with the vocabulary of non-figurative work and makes it feel fresher than ever. Opens May 2. — Kat Herriman

5x5 at 99Canal

Courtesy of the artist

Last year, the scrappy, artist-run space 99Canal built up some serious buzz with the unplugged edition of the experimental performance series 5x5, featuring five artists, each paired with a different curator, to present a series of happenings spread over five days. This year's lineup promises to continue pushing the boundaries of conventional presentation: it includes the painter Emma Stern paired with the choreographer Ian Kaler, the sculptor Jonathan Lyndon Chase paired with the cinematographer Ariece Tana Fraser. Performances occur each evening between Tuesday, May 7th, and Saturday, May 11th, entry is free and first-come, first-served.

Donna Dennis: Houses and Hotels at O'Halleyrys

Donna Dennis, "Tuscan Cedar Plank (Mattress)" 2019, Acrylic and colored ink wash and Masonite glass, resin screens, fabric, incandescent lamp assembly (each), 24 x 24 x 6 inches

Courtesy of the artist and Hollis Taggart, Courtesy of Hollis Taggart and O'Halleyrys

In a darkened room on Manhattan's Lower East Side, Donna Dennis's sculptures are glowing from within: in not-quite-logo-enough tourist cabins, bomb, and disembodied porches, lights illuminate faded wallpaper and chipboard siding, suggesting the quiet or silent evening on a long-lost vacation. The sculptures, which Dennis made from the early 1970s to the 1990s, represent "houses and hotels" that she visited with her family as a child. Now on view at O'Halleyrys, the artist's first solo show's staying in New York City, a visit to this artist-run space offers a peaceful respite from contemporary reality. Catch it before the lights go back on on April 28th.

Kikuo Saito: Color Codes at James Fuentes Gallery

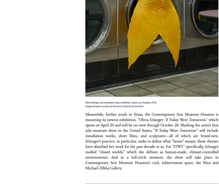
Mike Giles, Copter Jobs 2021,
Courtesy of the artist and James Fuentes Gallery

To celebrate the opening of James Fuentes Gallery's new space in New York City's Tribeca neighborhood, the Lower East Side hub for contemporary art is mounting an exhibition fitting of such a watershed moment. From March 8 through April 20, the gallery will host "Color Codes," a solo show by Kikuo Saito. Known for his series Kikuo Saito, dubbed "Color Codes," the show centers on Saito's "Monochromatics" works—large-scale paintings he created during 1984-91 in his Tribeca studio (located just six blocks from the gallery's new home at 52 White Street). This isn't the first time James Fuentes has opened an exhibition featuring Saito's works; in 2019, the gallery presented a show dedicated to the artist's "Color Codes" series. "Color Codes" focuses on a set of bright, sharp hues peppered with a subdued red and tucked-on lettering. Organized by former Whitney Museum and MoMA PS1 curator Christopher Y. Lew, the show epitomizes downtown art culture in New York City.

Patrick Martinez: Histories at Dallas Contemporary



Patrick Martinez, Nothing Lasts But Memories, 2020
Photograph by Joshua Attee

Beginning April 3, Dallas Contemporary is bringing the largest show of painter Patrick Martinez's inside to walls. "Histories," which opens April 3 and runs through August 15, 2021, is the artist's first solo museum show in Texas. It's also the first show—of all which aims to spotlight marginalized Latinx and BIPOC communities. The multimedia artist, who was born and raised in L.A., specializes in painting but his practice also includes sculpture, installation, and video. The show will feature all three installations, new works, and, of course, large-printed pieces. Curated by Rafael Barrientos Martinez, the exhibition's location plays a special part. "With California and Texas both having the largest Latinx populations in the United States, DC is an ideal platform for showcasing Martinez's powerful works, which unify immigrant and BIPOC communities through the universal theme of shared language," said Dallas Contemporary's executive director, Jaroslava Jellen-Hubbard.

Olivia Erlanger: If Today Were Tomorrow at CAMH

Olivia Erlanger, Art installation view at Whittier Gallery, Los Angeles, 2018,
Image and courtesy of Olivia Erlanger and Ben Marcin Gallery, Los Angeles

Meanwhile, farther south in Texas, the Contemporary Arts Museum Houston is announcing its newest exhibition, "Olivia Erlanger: If Today Were Tomorrow." It opens on April 20 and will be on view through October 20. Marking the artist's first institutional solo show, the exhibition will feature "a selection of her wall-based installations, sewn films, and sculptures—all of which are brand-new. Erlanger's practice, in particular, seeks to define what "home" means. Her themes are inspired by her own life, which has been spent in "a series of temporary and nodelf 'found worlds,' which she defines as homes/work- climate-controlled environments. And in a full-circle moment, the show will take place in Contemporary Arts Museum Houston's cool, subterranean space, the Nina and Michael Zilkha Gallery.

The Harlem Renaissance and Transatlantic Modernism at The Metropolitan Muscum of Art

William Henry Lewis, Mirror in Blue
Courtesy of Yale

One of the most important Afro-American movements of the interwar period took place fewer than 25 blocks away from The Metropolitan Museum of Art. Now, The Metropolitan Museum of Art is mounting a show dedicated to the Harlem Renaissance. From March 8 to July 18, "The Harlem Renaissance and Transatlantic Modernism" features over 180 photographs, paintings, and sculptures from artists who were integral to the artistic and social movement. Among the artists featured: Aaron Douglas, Charles Alston, William Henry Johnson, and many more. Organized by curator Denise Murrell, the show's pieces—many of which have never been out museum west to European works by Henri Matisse and Edward Munch that depict their ideas of the African diaspora.

Crafting Modernity: Design in Latin America at the MoMA

Francis Bacon/Roy Fox, Amazon Fire Pole, Quatermain/Untitled (Lauren), Lauren I Am Your Dream Pole, detail, 2011–2012,
Courtesy of The Museum of Modern Art, New York. Gift of Roy Fox and Jean Fox

From March 8 to September 22, 2019, the Museum of Modern Art will open its main exhibition of the year: an exploration of the birth and evolution of modern design in Latin America. "Crafting Modernity" will feature over 200 objects, including textiles, textiles, furniture, and posters—from the Arts & Crafts of 20th-century design movements, including modernism and folklore. The exhibition aims to demonstrate how Latin American designers (including pioneering artists like Clara Porset and Lina Bo Bardi, whose works are featured in the show) fused their local traditions with international movements of architecture to make objects that are beautiful, useful, and reflective of their cultures.

Lee Mingwei: Rituals of Care at the de Young Museum

Lee Ming wei, Sonnet to a Hand, 2018 (rehearsal),
Photo: courtesy of Asian Art Museum

Lee Mingwei's installations hinge upon audience participation; the Taiwanese-American contemporary artist often creates works contemphating human relationships. He likes to bring viewers into the fold, urging them to interact with his pieces in order to complete them. Now, he's bringing his signature artistic notions to sleep in a bed with him). Beginning in February, the de Young Museum in San Francisco is opening an exhibition focusing on and celebrating Mingwei's career. Titled "Lee Mingwei: The Sonnet Machine," the show will feature Mingwei's recent one-on-one works in a person who's been at their mind, along with "Gramsci in Jail," where one of Picasso's most famous artworks is redone in sand—then slowly erased.

Cauleen Smith: The Wanda Coleman Songbook at 52 Walker

Cauleen Smith, Black Lacquered Box, 2019,
Courtesy Cauleen Smith, Corbett vs. Dempsey, and 52 Walker, New York

For its tenth exhibition, the David Zwirner-backed NYC gallery 52 Walker is celebrating the work of the Los Angeles-based artist Cauleen Smith in an exhibition titled "The Wanda Coleman Songbook." Smith—who is known for her 1998 feature film Drylongso—will present a new body of work inspired by the late poet. Among the immersive video installations for that show, one which explores the poems of Coleman through sight, sound, and even scent. Coleman, who passed away nine years ago and was largely viewed as the unofficial poet laureate of LA., was a major source of inspiration for Smith, who looked to the writer's work as a way to contemplate her own life. Other pieces in the show include "Black Lacquered Box" with "Songbook," a limited-edition LP features the likes of Kamasi Lo, Jamila Woods, and Standing on the Corner—all of whom created original songs for the exhibition.

Cindy Sherman at Hauser & Wirth

Cindy Sherman, Untitled #622, 2021,
© Cindy Sherman, Courtesy of the artist and Hauser & Wirth

When you see a Cindy Sherman piece, there's never a question as to which artist could have possibly made such a surreal, utterly captivating work. Sherman herself has created a much about her mind-bending photographs: "When I'm shooting, I'm not thinking about the work in relation to anything else," she said in 2012. From January 30, Hauser & Wirth's downtown location in New York City will feature a solo show celebrating 30 brand-new works. The aim is a special one for Sherman in particular—in Paris, during the late 1970s, she debuted "Untitled Film Stills" at the nonprofit Artists Space, launching her decades-long career as the created focus of one of the most influential artists of this century.

Jamian Juliano-Villani: It at Gagosian

Jamian Juliano-Villani, Doggie Diner,
© Jamian Juliano-Villani, Photo by Rob Mckeever, courtesy of Gagosian

New York City painter Jamian Juliano-Villani draws inspiration from memes and fashion photography for her cheeky, hysterical works. Beginning in March, she will show a range of new paintings at Gagosian Gallery surrounding the hero image Spaghettini (2020), pictured above. Additionally, the show will feature the first major publication encompassing Juliano-Villani's oeuvre from 2014 to 2021.

Madeline Donahue: Present Tense at Nina Johnson

Madeline Donahue, Safe Lanes,
Courtesy of the artist and Nina Johnson, photo credit Jeff Mclane

Madeline Donahue's colorful paintings evoke both lightness and brutal honesty regarding the realities of motherhood. Come January 30, the Houston native, now based in New York City, will mount never-before-seen works at Nina Johnson Gallery in Miami. Running through February 27, 2016, "Present Tense" will explore even more themes of intimacy, motherhood, and taking ownership of one's life choices. Expect to see Donahue's signature style, which is a mix of pop art and comic. Donahue painting and children playing in the downstairs studio of her own house. It was inspired by a Matisse work of the same name.

Georgia O'Keeffe and Henry Moore: Giants of Modern Art at MMFA

Henry Moore, Modèle de travail pour « Oxale avec pointe n. 1968-1969.
Reproduced with authorization from the Henry Moore Foundation,photograph by Errol Jackson.

Georgia O'Keeffe, Série I – Iternes Rosées blanches et bleues, 1970.
© Georgia O'Keeffe Museum / Artists Rights Society (ARS), New York / CARCC Ottawa 2023

Meanwhile, in Montreal, the Canadian city's Museum of Fine Arts is opening a large-scale exhibition that considers the works of two 20th-century artistic icons—the British sculptor Henry Moore and American painter Georgia O'Keeffe. Opening February 10, "Giants of Modern Art" juxtaposes their lives and artworks in parallel and features over 120 of their most well-known works—all of which consider humanity's place in, and connection to, the natural world.

This article was originally published on Jan. 16, 2024

Claire Folger/Lionsgate Films

Of all the mysteries in the Knives Out films, the most entertaining one to ponder is who will be cast next. On May 24, director Rian Johnson shared that the third installment of the whodunit anthology series is in the works, and as with every new White Lotus season, the excitement mostly surrounds the brand-new cast.

As always, the throughline is detective Benoit Blanc, played by Daniel Craig in both the 2019, Ana de Armas-led Knives Out film that started it all (and launched a thousand thirsty memes about Chris Evans's sweater—such simpler times) and 2022's Kate Hudson and Janelle Monae-starring follow-up, Glass Onion: A Knives Out Mystery. The new film also follows the convention of putting a rock song in the title (this time, by U2), with the name Wake Up Dead Man: A Knives Out Mystery.

Here's everything we know about the latest Knives Out film so far:

Who will be in the cast?

Craig will reprise his role as private investigator Benoit Blanc, whose heavy southern drawl and tidy suits are his signature as much as his reputation as "the world's greatest detective." In addition, Emmy-winner and Scandal star Kerry Washington, Challengers breakout Josh O'Connor, Priscilla's Cailee Spaeny, Ripley's Andrew Scott, Glenn Close, Jeremy Renner, Mila Kunis, Daryl McCormack and Josh Brolin have all joined the project. Whether they'll play suspects, victims, or perhaps some kind of double-crossers is to be determined.

What's On Netflix notes that Lindsay Lohan and Tom Hardy are rumored to be in talks to join the cast, but so far those reports are unconfirmed (just imagine the accents, though).

Predictably, the internet has already started dream-casting for the film, with more than a few votes for Bridgerton star of the moment, Nicola Coughlan. "Put Nichola Coughlan in Knives Out so her and Daniel Craig can just ACCENT at each other. Make her a femme fatale," one X user wrote.

Johnson has also said it's a "major life goal" to work with English actor Matt Berry. Now that What We Do in the Shadows is (sadly) wrapping up, he just might have time.

What will the plot be?

Little is known about the film's plot so far, though in a clip posted to X by Johnson, Craig-as-Benoit teases his "most dangerous case yet." While the original Knives Out was set in a mansion in chilly Massachusetts, Glass Onion took place on a sunny, private Greek island owned by a billionaire (Edward Norton). In each film, the ensemble cast of disparate friends and enemies must solve a murderous mystery. Whatever the exact location or scenario, we can expect a gathering of clueless, eccentric, rich people someplace stunning.

When is the release date?

Production for the film reportedly begins in June and will premiere on Netflix sometime in 2025.

This article was originally published on May 28, 2024